2008 TRADE MARKET NEGLECTS HUMAN RIGHTS E-commerce web site sets up fair trade global market for third world artisans

Human rights aren't as right as the U.S. has come to think they are. There are still countries where people cannot get the fair treatment that can make or break their survival. And below that level of treatment are the women, women who must somehow find the resources to care for their children and financially support their family. Global Daughter expands their village market to the world and provides a place where they can get fair value for their wares.

What is Global Daughter? Globaldaughter.com is an e-commerce site that offers amazingly affordable hand crafted jewelry, personal and home accessories that tell a story. All funds are set at a fair value and currently go directly to the third world artisans in Nepal. The company also encourages consumers to get together with their friends to host Global Daughter parties. Similar to Tupperware or Party Lite parties Global Daughter will send a Global Daughter consultant to the comfort of your home and present their products for purchase.

Global Daughter was started by Erin Miller and Erika Mosebach in the beginning of 2008 and they plan to expand their online market by continuing to create fair trade centers in other small countries.
